SYNOPSIS

Ma Pomme (Maurice Chevalier), a hobo, discovers one day that he is the executor and co-heir of a vast fortune left by one of his ancestors. The other heirs involved are Mr. Peuchat (Jean Wall), a banker, Mme. Deply (Jane Marken), an old lady with a mania for gambling. According to the terms of the will, the fortune is to be left to the heirs named above, only if the executor of the estate, Ma Pomme, agrees to accept the fortune.

Ma Pomme, who is more interested in vagabonding than being a millionaire at first refuses to accept the heritage, thus creating a furor among the other heirs, for he has discovered that the banker's only interest in the money is to ruin his competitors, and the old lady's interest in the money is for the sole purpose of gambling it away at the casinos. In all of this, Ma Pomme is egged on by Mme. Peuchat (Sophie Desmaretz) who finds in Ma Pomme, a fascinating diversion from the life she leads with her husband.

At the last moment, however, a fourth heir is discovered, Claire (Vera Norman), a young air-hostess. Ma Pomme decides to withhold his decision about the acceptance of the fortune until he has had a chance to speak with Claire. He meets Claire and decides that here is an heir who is in need of the money, and would put it to good use, and decides to accept the inheritance.

Ma Pomme is now a millionaire with luxurious apartments, butlers, business affairs and ulcers. In the interim, Mme. Deply has broken the bank at one of the casinos, but died from shock, leaving her share of the fortune to Ma Pomme, much to his dismay. The other heirs as well, are having their difficulties. Ma Pomme tries to straighten out the affairs of the other heirs, and then decides that he has had enough of being a millionaire.

After arranging for the construction of a rest camp for hobos with his share of the money and saying goodbye to Claire and Mme. Peuchat, Ma Pomme takes to the road once more.
