Two Italian waifs, identified only as Peppino and Stellina, have accomplished a man-sized job in walking away with the new Italian film, "Alone in the Streets."

The import, at the 8th St. Playhouse, is an extremely touching story in the neo-realistic style. Director-writer Silvio Siano has modeled his quite effective work upon the previous success, "Shoe Shine," and has done well, at that. His cases in point are the aband-

Wearing a dirty, tattered sweater, a scarf jauntily around his neck and with his undersized pants held up by a rope, he is utterly captivating. Stellina, some years younger, is full-faced and cherubic. They both worked amazing well.

"Alone in the Streets," a Carroll Pictures release, tackles a grim juvenile delinquent problem, more dramatic since it concerns the sub-teen division. The climax, which should bring out the handkerchiefs, is a concession for those who must have a happy ending. It is the weak link in a strong film.

The only professionals in the cast are the adults. Carlo Tamberlani plays a newly appointed police commissioner who is appalled at the procession of street children turning into criminals. Tecla Scrano portrays Peppino's foster mother, an earthy type with a brood to feed. Sparing the boy little maternal feeling, she uses him in her lottery business. When an embarrassing incident (about the only humorous touch in the film) involving three winners turns up, she ejects him in a fit of temper.

Brunella is faced with the more immediate problem of a poor but loving suitor and Stellina's attentions are appreciated but inadequate. In an exciting climax, the young boy, with three playmates, assists in a robbery masterminded by two grown-up delinquents.

The older members of the cast turn in good performances. Miss Bovo is especially capable as the sympathetic sister. But the youngsters of the film are the real stars.

oned children of Naples. He's plucked his actors from the littered streets and slum playgrounds and describes graphically how even the littlest ones must earn their keep and board, by whatever means they manage.

Siano wisely picked Peppino and Stellina from this group for his protagonists. The 8-year-old boy, Peppino, has the larger role.
